- 1 Fig. 1 is a news item about UK airports and the Civil Aviation Authority (CAA).

Airports must put passengers first

Passengers' needs are to be put first under new measures designed to improve the air passenger experience and the economic regulation of airports unveiled by Transport Secretary, Geoff Hoon. Under the plans, the aviation regulator, the Civil Aviation Authority (CAA), will be given a new primary duty to promote the interests of passengers. Air passengers will also get a new champion – 'Passenger Focus' – which will represent them as it does for rail and bus users.

The CAA will also be given a new secondary duty to ensure that airports meet their environmental obligations. The CAA will not be asked to develop its own environmental policies but must make sure that its economic regulation of airports is consistent with existing environmental obligations placed on airports.

Geoff Hoon said: "I want to put passengers at the heart of how our airports are run – this will help ensure that we get the most efficient and competitive aviation sector possible. The CAA has told government that its current duties lack clarity. These require it to further the interests of both airlines and passengers, without saying who comes first. Today, I am removing that lack of clarity – the passenger must come first."

Passengers have told us that although they are broadly happy with their experience of airports, they want things like more seating areas, more toilets, better flight information and more baggage carousels open at busy times – these are exactly the kind of issues which we will expect the CAA to address in discharging its new duty."

The new duties are part of a package which is designed to improve the economic regulation of UK airports. The measures have been based on the recommendations of a panel of independent experts which was appointed in June 2008 to review the economic regulation of UK airports.
