STARBUCKS LOSES ITS SHINE

Starbucks is an international chain of coffee shops. It has over 15,000 branches in 49 countries including the UK. In the 1990s it expanded rapidly, but by 2009, after years of growth, the business was in trouble. So what happened? Some business consultants say Starbucks simply grew too fast, too soon.

Starbucks' growth means that as well as 'coffee and cakes', the company also sells books, music, and films. These activities have, however, not always been profitable. "Success was built on the coffee experience," said one consultant. "By moving so far beyond that without a clear business plan, it risked losing everything." 5

Starbucks has also been the target for protests on issues such as employment and also fairtrade policies. In 2008, an American court ordered Starbucks to pay its waiters and waitresses more than $100m which managers had illegally taken from their tips. Others have claimed that Starbucks does not pay its suppliers an ethical price for its coffee. Starbucks disputes this and points to the fact that it has set up the 'Shared Planet' initiative to minimise environmental damage and to create a better future for coffee farmers. 10

These criticisms have had some effect on consumer demand. Consumer demand has also been affected by a range of other external factors. To make matters worse, Starbucks has also been faced with the threat of higher costs for coffee as a result of poor harvests. Starbucks operates in an oligopolistic market, alongside other well known high street retailers such as Costa Coffee and Caffé Nero. 15

A Starbucks' spokeswoman declined to comment on the closure of any under-performing UK coffee shops or how many it would open over the next year. She said, "Starbucks continues to plan new store openings internationally, including in the UK." 20
