SECTION B

Read the passage below and then answer all parts of Question 8 on pages 8–10 of the question paper.

Why we need a national theatre.

At a time of increasing globalization smaller countries feel a national theatre is a way to secure and proclaim their identity. Alongside moves in Wales, a National Theatre of Scotland is taking shape. This is good news.

In continental Europe national theatres were expressions of cultural bigotry. In Britain our National Theatre came about, after more than a century of shilly-shallying, through an accidental combination of circumstances. Peter Hall created a national company at Stratford. Laurence Olivier existed as a symbolic head of the profession. The old London county council offered a rent-free site. Even so we created a national theatre company 13 years before we gave it a building.

In Wales, there is a desire to preserve the Welsh language. In Scotland the urge is to tap into the extraordinary revival in Scottish writing. Clearly there is no single recipe for a national theatre.

But what's a national theatre for? And how does it express our national identity?

One thing it offers is "the standardisation of the best". I saw this at the National, in 1964. "Hobson's Choice", long regarded as a rep standby, emerged as a masterpiece of regional realism. I realised that a national theatre, through subsidy and permanence, could achieve an unmatchable aesthetic excellence.

The National's most important function, and one that has significant lessons for Scotland and Wales, is to act as a mirror to society. Today, devolution and the debate over multiculturalism have made Britain a different country. The National's 'Henry V' was significant because, with its arguments among English, Welsh, Scottish and Irish characters, it is a debate about nationhood. Yet a London-based national theatre can never fully reflect the diversity of the UK. This is why the moves in Wales and Scotland are to be welcomed.

Something that can be learned from London's example is that a national theatre only comes alive when it engages with the present. Welsh and Scottish national theatres will only justify their existence if they examine the political conflicts and social tensions that are part of their countries' identities.

A national theatre is not just a cultural hypermarket. It is a way to publicly examine what nationhood means in the modern world. Every country in the UK should have its own national theatre.
