Representative Assemblies

The Houses of Parliament at Westminster provide a visual symbol at the heart of British government, the very centre of political power. Indeed, the sovereignty of Parliament has long been regarded as the key principle of the British constitution. Yet some argue that despite its considerable age and prestige, Parliament has lost power and is dominated by the Executive which largely controls the legislative process. Moreover, the Westminster Parliament is no longer the only representative assembly elected by British citizens but is now just one among a number of representative bodies which exist at local, national and European levels.

The Parliamentary Commissioner for Administration and the Redress of Grievances

The redress of grievances is an important feature of representative democracy. In the UK, for example, it has been one of the traditional roles of MPs and local councillors to seek redress on behalf of their constituents. In addition, special machinery sometimes exists either to enable elected representatives to pursue redress more effectively or to provide citizens with additional avenues for complaint. For example, since 1967 there has been a Parliamentary Commissioner for Administration (Ombudsman) who is independent of government. However, the position carries limited powers and has been described as “ineffective and toothless”.

- (a) Explain the term redress of grievances used in the extract. (8 marks)
- (b) “Ineffective and toothless.” Discuss this view of the Parliamentary Commissioner for Administration (Ombudsman). (22 marks)

OR

- 4 Study the extract below and answer parts (a) and (b) which follow.

The Prime Minister, Civil Servants and Ministers

At the centre of government there are powerful political actors, although their relationship in theory is not always the same as their relationship in practice. With ministers and civil servants, for example, the constitutional position is that politically neutral civil servants give advice but ministers decide policy. Similarly, the constitutional position is that the Cabinet decides policy. In reality neither of these positions actually applies. Civil servants largely determine policy and the Prime Minister, although under personal and political constraints, largely controls the Cabinet.

- (a) Explain the term politically neutral in the context of the civil service. (8 marks)
- (b) How accurate is the claim that “the Prime Minister, although under personal and political constraints, largely controls the Cabinet”? (22 marks)
