When answering the questions that follow, you may wish to refer to the passage below but you do not have to do so. However, your answers must present material drawn from the range of your studies in Government and Politics.

A1 ‘The power of governments can often be more limited than is popularly thought.’ Discuss. (40 marks)

A2 ‘Modern democracy does not mean that all citizens have equal power.’ Discuss. (40 marks)

Power and Political Equality

Most democratic political systems are, in principle, equalitarian. They are based on universal suffrage whereby each person has equal influence. In practice, it does not work that way. There is a wide variation in the political influence exercised by citizens. One reason for this is that most – probably all – modern democracies are neither in principle nor in practice equalitarian when it comes to social and economic matters. Wide differences exist among individuals in income, educational attainment and occupational status. Such differences mean that citizens are differentially endowed with resources that can be used for political activity and influence. As citizens convert such resources into political influence, political inequality appears. The political advantage of those citizens more advantaged in socio-economic terms is found in all nations.

The history of democracy is in large part the history of the development of regular and legal channels (such as voting, pressure group activity and redress of grievances) through which citizens can express their preferences and apply pressure on the government to comply with those preferences. The extent to which such channels are available and the extent to which they are used are crucial in understanding the effectiveness of democracy. The perceived inadequacy, or the unequal availability, of regular and legal channels can lead to the use of alternative means of political influence, such as direct action protests.
