Section A

Answer the question in this section.

Use the source below and your own knowledge to answer Question 1.

Source for Question 1

The president is often regarded as the principal force behind changes in federal-state relations. Since the 'Dual' or 'Classical' federalism of the Founding Fathers, various types of federalism have been associated with a particular president. 'Cooperative federalism' is linked to President FD Roosevelt's New Deal, and 'New federalism' with President Nixon. However, there are a range of factors which can influence federal-state relations. Recently, the Rehnquist Court was said to have been the architect of a 'federalism revolution' and the Congress too, with Republican majorities, has had a significant role to play.
