Source A Serious indictments have been laid against those who made British military and foreign policy in the inter-war years, especially Baldwin and Chamberlain. However, the political leaders of the 1930s were not ‘guilty men’ as is sometimes claimed, nor men who acted out of blindness and later fear. Driven by idealism, optimism and courage, they worked and prayed for peace. Only retrospectively can it be seen how misplaced their political and diplomatic analyses and expectations were, and how much wiser they would have been to heed military advice earlier.

Source C The reactions in Britain to the Polish crisis in the summer of 1939 were a repetition of those over Prague a few months earlier. By now the Labour and Conservative anti-appeasers in the Commons were suspicious of Chamberlain, and refused to let Parliament adjourn lest negotiations with Hitler be concluded during the recess. These suspicions appeared justified in late August, as London urged Germans and Poles to settle their differences over Danzig; and even more so by 1 September, when the German attack commenced. For two days, while Poland was being bombed and shelled, Chamberlain and his colleagues hesitated, seeking to the last to find a modus vivendi, and also attempting to co-ordinate moves with the French, who were even more reluctant to plunge into war. But it was not to be. The public pressure on the government, far greater than that of March, forced it reluctantly onwards.
