Sources for use with SECTION A.

Source 1: From The Sunday Telegraph, a British newspaper, published on 5 November 2008. The article was written by Tim Shipman in Washington DC. Shipman was the Sunday Telegraph's American correspondent in the years 2007–09. This article was written the day after Obama's election.

Obama's triumph was that he made himself credible and gave sceptics an excuse to believe again in politics and that he gave African Americans a chance to believe in their own potential. But more than that, he ran a campaign that was defined so little by race that he allowed white people to share the dream. What always separated Obama from the rest was the vast scale of the enthusiasm he unleashed. Black Americans did not believe he could win and only threw their support behind him when he proved that white America was prepared to accept him. Then they came out in their thousands. Throughout, Obama remained calm. He never played the angry black man and he successfully distanced himself from those with more extreme views. 5 10

Throughout the turmoil of the financial crisis, he retained an unnatural calm. Where his Republican opponent, John McCain, was impulsive, Obama seemed presidential and detached. Obama was lucky too, the right candidate for an age that was weary of the Iraq war and President George W Bush's brand of conservatism. 15

The second major reason he won is that he built perhaps the most formidable campaign organisation in US political history. It was the dedication and discipline of his campaigners on the ground that helped him over the line in states like Florida and Ohio. If the promise of change is what ran up the vote in Democratic states it was the tough grind of doorstep work which ultimately won it elsewhere. 20

Source 2: From an article written by Patrick James on 7 November 2008. James is a Professor of International Relations at the University of Southern California and an expert on American foreign policy and US politics.

The Obama campaign did almost everything imaginable right. It was one of the most confidently executed campaigns I've ever seen. He is a very alive and adaptable thinker, and I just think they ran about as good a campaign as they could. If he had made the mistakes McCain did, he would have been doomed. 25

Over in McCain's camp it was almost a perfect storm of mistakes. People are questioning and saying how could he have picked Sarah Palin as his running mate? That's where he went wrong. However McCain was in a desperate position with those on the Republican right, who have strong influence over the Republican base, heavily criticising him. That put him in a terrible position. He was doomed with the Republican right. They were not going to campaign for him. That lack of support guided McCain's vice-presidential choice. He was forced to pick Palin or somebody similar to her. 30

McCain made one other major error. He had a tremendous opportunity when Obama gave in to Wall Street pressure on the bailout bill*. Obama, George W Bush and Congress were all saying the same thing. Here's what McCain did terribly wrong. He's in this situation where he's many points behind and needs to differentiate himself. The bailout is incredibly unpopular, Bush is supporting it and so is Obama – McCain could have gained votes by opposing it. That could have had an enormous effect. That was his chance, his golden opportunity. McCain had lousy political instincts. He made bad choices, including floundering around with attack advertisements, trying to please the Republican base. None of it worked. 35 40
