Extracts for use with Section A.

Extract 1: From D G Wright, Napoleon and Europe, published 1984.

It was in 1807 that Napoleon set his sights on the Iberian Peninsula. Napoleon never really grasped the problem of the sheer size of Spain. What Napoleon termed 'the Spanish ulcer' persisted to 1814 and was engaging 250,000 French troops by the time he invaded Russia in 1812. While the French could easily handle the badly co-ordinated Spanish regular armies, guerrilla bands made it impossible for French forces to combine in sufficient numbers to oust the British. 5

There was no doubt that the French invasion of Spain was a catastrophic error on the part of Napoleon. It proved a constant drain on manpower and resources and helped encourage resistance to French rule in central and eastern Europe, besides blunting French morale and eroding the prestige of France's armies. The effort needed to hold back the British played an important part in crippling Napoleon's defensive campaigns in Germany and France in 1813 and 1814. The Spanish war cost Napoleon 300,000 casualties and untold quantities of gold and war materials. Arguably, the French could have won in Spain if Napoleon had been willing to assume permanent command there, but this would have meant restraining his ambitions elsewhere in Europe. The war in Spain was never popular in France and became a factor in the alienation of the propertied middle-classes from Napoleon's regime. 10 15

Extract 2: From G Ellis, The Napoleonic Empire, published 1991.

Defeat in the Peninsula would not itself have been enough to bring Napoleon down. A successful Russian campaign might have even allowed him a new commitment in Spain. The mistakes of the 1812 Russian campaign were three-fold. First, despite careful preparations, Napoleon had not paid enough detailed attention to the problem of securing his supply lines for a campaign so far removed from his base. Secondly, he mistook the Russian retreat and 'scorched-earth' policy for a sign of weakness in his enemy. Lastly, he seems to have supposed, after the costly victory at Borodino, that a decisive battle for Moscow would cause the Tsar to surrender. In fact, the sheer size of Russia allowed Alexander to retreat to several inaccessible places. 20 25

The result was that Napoleon stayed in Moscow too long. He did not get the decisive showdown he sought. He exposed his exhausted army in its retreat to counter-attacks by troops who could exploit the stalemate created by the Russian winter. The total losses suffered were around 380,000 men. The loss of field guns and horses was the heaviest on record. France lacked sufficient resources to sustain major wars on two fronts – Russia and Spain – so far apart. The loyalty of the German states was not unlimited. Several defected in 1813–14. Without such military supports the 'Grand Empire', so tirelessly built up over seven or eight years, finally fell apart in rather less than one. 30 35
