Extracts for use with Section A.

Extract 1: From R Price, A Concise History of France, published in 1993.

In France, war-weariness increased rapidly with the failure of Napoleon's Russian campaign and during the defensive campaigns of 1813–14. The British blockade intensified the commercial crisis, which had resulted from the poor harvests of 1811–12. An extremely harsh winter added to popular misery and discontent. The burden of taxation became even more difficult to bear. 5

By the end of 1813 the allies had crossed the Rhine, and Wellington was advancing in the south. Even the normally subservient French law-making body voted in favour of peace. In 1813–14, the refusal of young men to report for military duty became a major problem, as army casualties increased and morale declined. The call to defend the nation, by the distant government in Paris, seemed irrelevant to the problems of daily life in many parts of France. The widespread disturbances over food shortages and unemployment also contributed to a breakdown in law and order. Defeat and internal disorder threatened the loyalty to the Napoleonic empire of the propertied classes. A loyalty that had been based upon the promise of social order and prosperity. 10 15

On 31 March 1814, in spite of an often-brilliant defensive campaign led by Napoleon, the allies entered Paris. On 2–3 April the senate and legislative body voted to remove the Emperor from his throne. On 6 April his own marshals forced him to abdicate. This collapse in his political power represented a massive withdrawal of support by the most influential people. The masses remained to a large degree apathetic. 20

Extract 2: From R Ashby, Napoleon Against Great Odds: The Emperor and the Defenders of France, 1814, published in 2010.

Despite the importance of the political problems in France in 1814, France was ultimately overwhelmed by a superior combination of enemy forces. Even with support within France, the Emperor could not continually match his military resources against most of Europe. Military resources, it must be emphasised, 25 involved far more than numbers of men. Napoleon at one time had at his disposal vast military resources, but he squandered them in Russia in 1812 and in Germany in 1813, not to mention in Spain from 1808–1813. Every defeat had some political repercussions for Napoleon but the actual losses in military hardware and supplies had direct consequences on the battlefield. After the 30 immense losses in Russia in 1812, the Emperor used up his impressive stockpile of military resources to create a new army. Even if he had continued to have overwhelming political support, the loss of the Napoleonic army in Germany in 1813 left him in the most acute military difficulty.

In fact, in terms of sheer numbers, rather than political influence, Napoleon did 35 maintain significant political support, especially among the peasantry. Despite the enormous political damage caused by the defeats of 1812 and 1813, it took the capture of Paris by enemy armies to guarantee his downfall.
