Extracts for use with Section A.

Extract 1: From A P Dobson and S Marsh, US Foreign Policy since 1945, published in 2001.

Immediately after the Second World War, the key geopolitical considerations were: Soviet power; US power; and the danger of a revival of German power. Once the Soviets and Americans began to fear each other's intentions, neither side could allow Germany to come wholly within the other's sphere of influence. The potential for increase in power that this would have brought for one would have been unacceptable to the other. This was the reason that the German problem was such a sensitive issue. 5

However, mutual suspicions and security fears spread wider than this. The Soviets did not have the atom bomb, but the Americans did, and that caused Soviet insecurity. The Soviets feared the economic strengths of the US and the danger of the spread of capitalism. Most of all the Soviets wanted security. They felt that the West wanted to deprive them of that security by interfering in Eastern Europe and denying them a part in the occupation of Japan. 10

The Americans had learnt from the War that an isolationist policy was not a practical policy. Consequently, they became deeply anxious as economic and political unrest spread through Western Europe and as Soviet public statements became increasingly critical of the West. American worries were made worse when the Soviets began to act unilaterally in Eastern Europe. The Americans did not fear an invasion of Europe by the Soviet army but they did fear that Europe was vulnerable to the spread of Soviet-inspired political upheaval. 15 20

Extract 2: From D C Engerman, Ideology and the Origins of the Cold War 1917–1962, published in 2011.

The defeat of Nazi Germany in 1945 cleared the stage for the expansion of American-Soviet ideological conflict into a global cold war. Cold War conflict took place over being a member of the 'Free World' or of the 'Socialist Bloc'. The features of ideological conflict took shape in the crucial years of 1946 and 1947. 25

1946 saw both the USA and the USSR move towards their acceptance of a world divided in two. In 1947, they went on to define these two halves as ideological opponents. This gave the American-Soviet conflict its final shape as a conflict between different social systems both intent on expanding their influence across the world. The American argument was made by President Truman in March 1947. Truman announced his Doctrine – that the United States would intervene in the name of freedom in Greece, and wherever else freedom was threatened. Truman defined the Cold War as an ideological battle of freedom against totalitarianism; as a battle between different ways of life. 30

The Soviets, having emphasised national security and national defence in fighting World War II, now emphasised the Cold War as an ideological conflict. Communist ideology blamed American expansionism on capitalism. 35
