The Conservative Leadership Contest

Iain Duncan Smith was elected as leader of the Conservative Party under a new system. For the first time 318000 Conservative Party members participated in choosing their new leader. In the early stages of the contest, Conservative MPs voted to elect two candidates who were then put to the wider grassroots membership for election. Although the election of the leader is more democratic than in the past, the new system has its critics. The Campaign for Conservative Democracy feels that the two-stage election is flawed since it does not always allow grassroot members to vote for the candidate of their choice. It is argued that with internal party democracy, party members should be free to vote on all candidates, not just two. However, the more democratic the Conservative Party becomes, the more it may reflect the policy preferences of an ageing membership.

Britain's Changing Party System

Fifty years ago, the Labour and Conservative parties dominated the party system at general elections in terms of voting behaviour and candidates returned to Parliament. Since then, the UK has developed a 'multi-party electorate' which has resulted in significant parliamentary gains for third parties. The Liberal Democrats have enjoyed a revival in popularity. Nationalist parties have won representation since the 1960s and 1970s. The Green Party and the BNP have made advances, although not yet in Westminster. However, single-issue politics is represented with the election of Martin Bell as an 'anti-sleaze' MP in 1997 and Richard Taylor as the Independent Kidderminster Hospital and Health Concern Party MP in 2001.

Interest Groups and the Policy Process

Interest groups have an important role in the policy process. Britain has a political culture that is highly consultative. It is seen as important to consult in order to simplify the policy process and to ensure the legitimacy of political decisions. However, consultation is not a right; it is given only to groups which abide by the 'rules of the game'. These rules frequently mean not upsetting the closed nature of policy-making and abiding by the demands for secrecy. Thus, insider groups gain access to Whitehall policy makers at a price.
