Question 1

Study the following source material and then answer the questions which follow.

Source A The English Church was not a hopelessly decadent institution on the eve of William's invasion. After 1066, great changes took place within the English Church and in its relationship to secular authority. How far these changes were the result of the Norman Conquest is difficult to establish, despite the questionable position of 5 Stigand. In fact, the Church already contained a number of bishops, some of them foreign, who were in favour of reform, attended councils abroad and maintained close contact with Rome. Furthermore, the buying and selling of ecclesiastical office and the marriage and immorality of the clergy were widespread on the continent as well as in England.

Source B In the English Church, bishops were mostly uneducated and the lower clergy hopelessly ignorant. As God's representative, Edward the Confessor's right to make appointments to bishoprics and monasteries was not disputed. How far he received money for this is questionable. To accuse a saint of simony is shocking. Pluralism

5 is not easy to define. But it does, however, appear to be true that pluralism was still common in England and, undoubtedly, Stigand was a case in point. Bishop Leofwine was married with sons. No great councils were summoned or reforms introduced during Edward's reign. Still, he was a saint and he did build Westminster Abbey.

Source C The impact of the Norman Conquest on the Church in England was scarcely less than that upon the state. Bishops and abbots were now closely bound to the king, owing knight service for their lands. The Conqueror himself presided over Church councils and his consent was necessary for their decrees. The most obvious results

5 were a reorganisation of the English Church to bring it up to date, and an almost complete change of personnel at the top. The new men, mostly drawn from the Norman Church at the height of its reform, brought with them a revived spirituality as well as organising ability. There were, inevitably, some failures. Abbot Thurstan set his knights on monks who resisted Norman chants and ceremonies. But in the main,

10 the appointments were good.
