The National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) attorneys, including the African-American Thurgood Marshall, began a legal strategy designed to end segregation in education. They developed a series of cases challenging segregation in graduate and professional schools. They believed that the battle against segregation had to begin at the highest academic level. After 5 establishing a series of legal precedents, the NAACP attorneys planned to launch an all out attack against the 'separate but equal' doctrine in primary and secondary schools. The strategy was successful. The 1950 McLaurin v Oklahoma decision ruled that internal separation in classrooms and cafeterias was unconstitutional. In 10 Sweatt v Painter, 1950, the Supreme Court said that the maintenance of separate law schools for blacks and whites was unconstitutional. Then a group of courageous black families, encouraged and supported by the NAACP, made an attack on segregation in schools.

On 1 December 1955, Mrs Rosa Parks refused to give her bus seat to a white man in defiance of local segregation laws. Who was Rosa Parks? Mrs Rosa Parks, like others, was steeped in the protest tradition; she had a long history of involvement with protest organisations. She began serving as a secretary for the NAACP in 5 1943 and still held that post in 1955. That position brought her into contact with such activists as Ella Baker, A. Philip Randolph and Roy Wilkins. Speaking about her action, Mrs Parks said 'my resistance to being mistreated on the buses and anywhere else was a regular thing with me and not just on that day'.
