Section AAnswer Questions 01 and 02.

Extract A

Late in 1885, Gladstone reached the conclusion that only Home Rule could resolve the situation in Ireland. He was disappointed that his Irish policy to date had still not 'pacified' Ireland as he had pledged himself to do in 1868. Equally, he was looking for a new 'moral' cause with which to stimulate the Liberal Party. When Gladstone introduced his Home Rule Bill early in 1886, Parnell gave it his fullest support. The Home Rule Bill produced a split in the Liberal Party, which ensured its ultimate defeat in the House of Commons. It was in any case a seriously flawed bill. Parnell was disappointed by the loss of the bill, but was reassured by the continued commitment of Gladstone to Home Rule.

Extract B

Dependent for the continuation of his government on the support of Parnell and his Irish votes, Gladstone put forward a Home Rule Bill in 1886. However, Gladstone was about to be faced with a 'constitutional doctrine' which made nonsense of his efforts, and the efforts of many who came after him, to apply democratic principles to the Irish situation. That doctrine was summed up by Randolph Churchill: 'Ulster will fight and Ulster will be right'. Churchill also introduced into British politics the tactic of 'playing the Orange card' – using the situation in northern Ireland for English electoral advantage. The emotion generated by the Tory/Unionist alliance defeated Gladstone's proposal and his government fell. The 'playing the Orange card' strategy was to be demonstrated again in 1912.
