Part 2 – Creating a new society

Question 3

Choose one of the following. Write on the same revolution you used to answer Questions 1 and 2.

America [1776–1789 Inauguration of George Washington]

Countryman on the new American Constitution

Reference: Edward Countryman, The American Revolution, pp. 199–200

We can begin to understand [the American Revolution] if we compare the Constitution with what went before. The contrast with the Articles of Confederation is obvious, but Gordon Wood and J.R. Pole have shown that the real frame of reference lies in the states. The Framers wrote a document that bore a strong resemblance to the New York constitution of 1777 and to the Massachusetts constitution of 1780. Like them, it provided for an executive that would be much more than simply a means for carrying out the legislature's will. Like them, it established a legislature of two houses, roughly equal in power and neither dependent on the other. Like the Massachusetts constitution, it rested its claims to legitimacy on having been written by a special convention and then ratified* in a manner that approached a popular decision. The Constitution was most emphatically a republican document. It established a political order that came as close as possible to having its basis in the consent of the people whom the government would rule.

But even by the standards of the day, it was not democratic . . . the Constitution aimed to limit involvement, not to encourage it . . . The senators would owe their office to the state governments, not to direct election. That and their six year terms would give them considerable immunity from popular pressure. Because there would be only two from each state, it was a fair prediction that only a man of considerable prominence could hope to win a seat. Even the House of Representatives was a far remove from the state assemblies. Initially, it would have only sixty-five members, making it not much more than a quarter the size of the assembly of Massachusetts. The House would represent constituencies as large as thirty thousand people, which was nearly the population of the whole state of Delaware . . . The two-year term of the representatives would be twice as long as the terms of most state assemblymen . . . [These provisions] . . . all served to insulate them [elected members of the new federal government] from what "the people" might want.

believes reflected the Constitution's nondemocratic nature.

France [5th August 1789–1795 Dissolution of the Convention]

Doyle on The flight to Varennes

Reference: William Doyle, The Oxford History of the French Revolution, p.152

The flight to Varennes was the Revolution's second great turning-point. Like the oath of the clergy, it forced Frenchmen to make choices that most would have preferred not to face. Even if it had succeeded choices would have been unavoidable. Whether the king merely intended, as he claimed, to go to Montmedy and negotiate from that safe distance; or whether, as most suspected (and his brother, Provence, who at the same time did reach the Austrian Netherlands, put about), he intended to emigrate and return at the head of Austrian armies, the achievements of the Revolution up to that moment would have been fundamentally challenged. Diplomats thought war would have been precipitated there and then. The failure of the attempted escape postponed the danger - but demanded choices of a different order. The Monarch had renounced the Revolution, and had explained why at great length in the proclamation he left behind. He complained of imprisonment in Paris, violation of property, and 'complete anarchy in all parts of the empire'. He denounced betrayal of the wishes expressed in the cahiers, the lack of power accorded to the Crown under the new constitution, the tentacular power usurped by the Jacobin clubs, and implicitly, the new religious order. How could such a man remain head of State? The blackest suspicions of the Parisian populace and radical leaders were confirmed. Republicans now came into the open. All over the capital symbols of royalty were attacked and defaced, and on 24 June the Cordeliers Club delivered a petition to the National Assembly to depose the king or consult the Nation on his fate in a referendum. A crowd of 30,000 escorted its presenters.

Russia [November 1917–1924 death of Lenin]

Pipes on Lenin's attitude to the Russian civil war

Reference: Richard Pipes, Russia Under the Bolshevik Regime, 1919–1924, pp. 5–6

To Lenin it [the civil war] meant the global class conflict between his party, the vanguard of the "proletariat," and the international "bourgeoisie": "class war" in the most comprehensive sense of the term, of which the military conflict was only one dimension. He not only expected civil war to break out immediately after his taking power, but took power in order to unleash it. For him the October coup d'état would have been a futile adventure if it did not lead to a global class conflict. Ten years before the revolution, analysing the lessons of the Paris Commune, Lenin agreed with Marx that its collapse was caused by its failure to launch a civil war. From the moment the World War broke out, Lenin denounced pacifistic socialists who called for an end to the fighting. True revolutionaries did not want peace: "This is a slogan of philistines and priests. The proletarian slogan must be: civil war." "Civil war is the expression of revolution . . ." wrote Bukharin and Preobrazhenskii in a widely read manual of Communism. Trotsky put it even more bluntly: "Soviet authority is organised civil war." From such pronouncements it should be evident that the civil war was not forced on the Communist leaders by the foreign and domestic "bourgeoisie": it lay at the heart of their political program.

China [1949–1976 death of Mao]

Lee Feigon on the Great Leap Forward

Reference: Lee Feigon, Mao: A Reinterpretation, pp. 122–123

The essential idea of the Great Leap Forward was to put most of the excess population to work in the new labor-intensive industries that required little or no capital investment. Everywhere an effort was made to develop small and medium-scale industries that could supplement the large, expensive factories already in the cities.

Since steel was a focus of the campaign, ingenious local efforts to increase steel production received much attention. Soon every village in China was constructing a small backyard steel furnace . . .

In addition to backyard furnaces, many areas built small chemical and fertilizer plants. In some places peasants mined small coal deposits as a way of increasing the local fuel supply. The Party mobilised armies of peasants to reclaim land, improve soil, and develop irrigation and water-control projects. In cities and towns throughout China, millions screamed and shook trees to confuse sparrows so that they could be easily killed . . . (Mao mistakenly believed that sparrows ate grain. When he was finally persuaded that in fact they ate insects, he substituted bedbugs for sparrows.)
