

If Lennie was not in the novel, George would not be the same man. It would change a lot of key points in the novel and would make George's life a lot easier. But that's what the novel is about George's and Lennie's life that's what makes him so important.

Lennie and George's relationship is more of a father and ~~tot~~ toddler relationship than friends. Lennie is really childlike and likes to 'pet' nice things. If he didn't have George he would probably be dead. Lennie got himself and George ran out weed by the men all because Lennie touched a girl's dress which he ~~thot~~ thought would feel nice. This left them both with no job and homeless.

Lennie and George have a 'dream' To own their own place a little house with a windmill were they would have chickens, ~~cats~~ cows and maybe even a horse, also rabbits for Lennie to tend. I Lennie wernt in the novel. George could acomplish this dream alone, he wouldnt of been chased out of weed and would of been able to keep his job able to earn ~~ea~~ enough money. Instead he ends up on a ranch trying to earn enough money to follow there dream.

George always has to remind Lennie of things as he's very forgetfull, and when Lennie does forget he acts in a child like mannor. "Strong as a bull" Lennie repeated george scowled at him, and Lennie dropped his head in shame at having forgotten.

Because of Lennie being dumb he's always getting himself into situations which dont need to be caused for example the fight in the bunk house, Lennie acting childish smiling at the thought of tending rabbits got himself into trouble with curly "Lennie ~~gave~~ gave a cry of terror, Blood welled from his nose" by using the words 'terror' and welled we know the situation is good and Lennie is to dumb and scared to fight back. "Get im' Lennie" only on georges account will Lennie fight back!

If Lennie was was not in the novel,
George wouldnt of been chased ~~of~~ out of weed
the fight with curley wouldnt of happend either the death of curleys wife. If the death of curley's wife didnt happen george wouldnt of had to kill lennie. Even though it seems Lennie is of a burdon to george, george ~~to~~ is devostated by his death and loved Lennie.
