In the autobiographical, non-fiction text, John Danalis explores the significance of learning through social, historical and cultural context.

Social context is a society's attitudes, this is evident throughout the text. The theme of education is present when Danalis 'So I enrolled at university as a mature-age student' this shows how important learning is in Australia or in Danalis society. ^{This is} even as a 'mature-age' ^{student} he still decides he needs to go to school to learn something. In Danalis society it is considered important to have an education as 'I was to everyone's great relief - soon to become a teacher.' This shows how important in society education is considered to be. The path of becoming a teacher creates new experiences that I needed to be learned. 'I knew that I had to learn about Aboriginal culture and history - after all, I was studying to become a teacher.' This shows that from just wanting to be able to teach Danalis had to learn about other cultures showing how significant learning is. ~~The importance of being~~
The insecurity of being 'a mature-age student' caused Danalis to embellish the idea of 'I was generally punctual and studious' to create a good impression so that he could finish his education to become a teacher.

Historical context is the past, this is evident throughout the text. The significance of learning is shown when 'I can't recall the first time I saw - I mean, consciously recognised - an Aboriginal person.' This shows that as you grow up you begin to learn about different things taught to you through your environment and people around. The way you learn about something can influence how you perceive things. This is shown 'I was taught that it was acceptable to marvel at the Aborigine in his natural setting'. This shows that Dandi's learning of the Aborigines was being strange and very different to the norm of his society. The racial views that Dandi learnt as a child shows how significant learning is as they stayed with him till he became an adult 'Black was black, and even in a suit or a doublet gown, I was warned, a spear chucker lurked just below the surface.' This shows how significant what you learn as a child is as it stays with you up till old age.

Cultural context is the traditions and beliefs of a society, this is evident throughout the text. The learning of the Aboriginal culture helped Dandi create a personal relationship with Gary 'Before the coil, I'd been reading about the importance of Indigenous people place on totems, so I asked Gary what the Wamba Wamba totem was.' This shows how Dandi learnt to look past his stereotypical views as a child and now showed genuine interest in the Aboriginal culture. The encounter with the black cockatoo the other day on Dandi's bike did help him to correct and understand why 'Our totem's the black cockatoo, the one with red tail feathers.' This show how learning can create an understanding and develop a relationship between individuals.

 Explains its significance. The learning of how the Aborigines learn 'He was just watching over you, to make everything okay; created an understanding between the significance of the black swan.

Examiner summary:

The candidate shows both a thorough understanding of the theme of learning in the text and an assured understanding of the context; this understanding is evidenced by the selection of relevant textual reference.
