3 Aistrigh an sliocht seo a leanas go Gaeilge.

Irish people have been emigrating for ages. There are few people in this country who don't have relatives in America, in Australia or in England.

With a tradition like that, and with family, cultural and language connections, it isn't any wonder that emigration still exists in Ireland at present.

Many young people who have acquired third level education head for foreign far-away countries. A lack of employment opportunities as well as a desire for adventure is the main cause of this.

Some of them want to experience other new cultures, see the world or seek employment. For the majority, though, they don't have any alternative but to leave home because the affairs of this country are so bleak.

Year on year, food and housing prices are raised; the high cost of living as well as continual rising rents prevent these graduates from staying in their homeland.

Many feel their career opportunities are limited and they therefore leave in pursuit of a much better quality of life abroad.
