The Liberal Welfare Reforms

Background Information

By the early 1900s many politicians could see that poverty and ill health were major problems for many people in Britain. When the Liberal Party came to power in 1906, they decided to bring in a range of reforms to improve the welfare of the people. These included Old Age Pensions, Labour Exchanges and National Insurance. How did people react to these reforms?

SOURCE B

When the Old Age Pensions began, life was transformed for the old people in the village. They were no longer worried. They were suddenly rich. Independent for life! At first when they went to the Post Office to draw their pensions, tears of gratitude would run down the cheeks of some. As they picked up their money they would say 'God bless that Lloyd George and God bless you, miss!' They brought flowers from their gardens and apples from their trees for the girl who merely handed them the money.

*The memories of Flora Thompson.
She worked in a small village Post Office in the early 1900s. She was writing in 1939.*

SOURCE C

The Old Age Pensions Act was brought in by Mr Lloyd George. But it was a well recognised fact that the Liberals would never have passed any measure at all without the pressure of the Labour Party. Labour made the Liberals afraid of losing their reputation as the party which wanted to improve people's lives. The Labour MPs were very angry and disappointed that the Liberal proposals on pensions did not go far enough. Labour wanted much more radical action.

From the memoirs of Joseph Clynes, a Labour Member of Parliament, published in 1937.

Before the Labour Exchanges Act came into effect, there were 61 Labour Exchanges in Britain. The number of new Labour Exchanges established during 1911 was 115. The total number of Labour Exchanges open at the end of 1912 was 414. The number of applicants given work in 1912 was 567,800. In addition, jobs of a casual nature were found for 12,767 individuals.

From a government report on the work of Labour Exchanges, published in 1912.

Dear Sir,
Many of our members have suffered this year because of disputes between employers and workers in other industries. These disputes have closed our workplaces and our members were put out of work. But they were not entitled to unemployment benefit. Our members feel very strongly, that when out of work through no fault of their own, they should receive unemployment benefit.

All employed persons in this country are brought within the sphere of this Act. Are they all treated equally? I think they are not. Self employed men such as small traders, bootmakers and window cleaners will lose out.

I am not at all satisfied that women under the Bill are going to be treated on the same terms as men. I am rather inclined to think the Bill will make the position of women far less secure.

Conservative MP Henry Forster speaking in Parliament about the National Insurance Act, December 1911.
