In 1871 the population of Cardiff was 47,500, but today it has grown to over 182,000. Wages are increasing. Colleges and schools, libraries and parks, telephones and postal facilities, shops and transport have improved life in the city.

QUESTION 1

This question is focused on the main economic and industrial developments. [18]

Study the sources opposite and then answer the question which follows.

- (a) What do Sources A and B suggest about the growth of Cardiff in the early twentieth century? [4]

SOURCE D

The rioters were completely out of control. Stone throwing spread quickly and urgent messages were sent to the police headquarters at Tonypandy for reinforcements. There was a total of 100 police against 3-4,000 angry rioters. They called in the military to disperse the rioters and then the police had little difficulty in clearing the streets.

[D. Evans, an historian writing in a book, Labour Strife in the South Wales Coalfields, published in 1911. This book was paid for by coal owners.]

SOURCE E

The riots took place following a strike by 15,000 miners who were demanding a decent wage and safer working conditions. The owners of the mines refused their demands and as a result there was unrest throughout the area. The arrival of the police and armed troops further angered the men and riots broke out.

[Arthur Horner, a 17 year-old miner and eyewitness to the Tonypandy riots, speaking to a journalist in 1911]

[A poster produced by the government in 1915. A man, with a large moustache and wearing military uniform, is shown pointing forward. At the top it says 'Britons' and underneath the man's face is written 'Wants you. Join your country's army! God save the King.']

Historians have made different interpretations about the role played by the generals in the great loss of life during the First World War.

The following pieces of evidence refer to the role of the generals in the great loss of life during the First World War.

Study these and answer the question which follows.

EVIDENCE 1

This interpretation is from Charles Messenger, a military historian who served as an officer in the armed forces during the 1940s and 1950s, writing in his book Trench Fighting, published in 1972.

He argues that the generals were not to blame for the great loss of life during the First World War.

It has been fashionable to criticise the generals during the war, as they continued to fight a trench war. But it must be remembered that they were all faced with an entirely new type of war, of which they had no previous experience. The task of the general in war is to win victories. Sooner or later one must attack and they did their best to do this.

EVIDENCE 2

This evidence is from George Morgan, recalling his time as a soldier in the First World War, for a BBC interview in 1976.

He argues that the generals were to blame for the great loss of life during the First World War.

The generals continued to order wave after wave of attacks from the trenches, wasting thousands of lives with each attempt, long after it should have been clear that they could not succeed. It was slaughter. The commanders, Haig and Rawlinson, didn't care about us. I don't think they were bothered about human lives.

EVIDENCE 3

This evidence is a photograph of soldiers in the trenches during a battle in 1915. They are lying on their stomachs on a slope and pointing their rifles over sandbags at the top. Men coming from behind them are bending forward to keep their heads down.

QUESTION 3

This question is focused on the main political, social and cultural issues. [12 + 3]

Did the Liberal governments of 1906-1914 deal successfully with the social and political problems of the time? [12]

In your answer you should discuss the successes and failures of the Liberal governments in dealing with social and political problems.

Marks for spelling, punctuation and the accurate use of grammar are allocated to this question. [3]
