Television has undoubtedly been the most important influence on sport since 1945. As well as bringing money and sponsorship into football since the creation of the Premiership in 1992, other sports like snooker have been completely updated by TV coverage. TV coverage has also made sports like golf truly global.

[M. Johnes, an historian writing in his specialist book,
A History of Sport in Wales (2005)]

- (d) How useful is Source D to an historian studying the influence of television coverage on sport?

These two sources say different things about professional sport.

Source E

Source F

I have great concerns over professionalism in sport. When rugby turned professional in 1995, it closed the door to the highest levels of the game to people like teachers, electricians, doctors, plumbers and to others who played rugby for enjoyment. Professional rugby has wiped out such opportunities. [John Dawes, former international rugby player of the 1960s and 1970s and Welsh national coach, writing in his memoirs (2005)]	In most sports the labels ‘amateur’ and ‘professional’ are now out of date. Professional sport now requires higher standards. Full-time training is necessary in nearly all sports for the highest level of competition. Modern athletes can only succeed with financial support from their governing bodies. [P. Beashel and J. Taylor, university lecturers in sports science, writing in their specialist book, Sport Examined (1992)]
