The signing of the Belfast (Good Friday) Agreement led to the establishment of the Northern Ireland Assembly and Executive. The Executive is comprised of 12 ministerial departments which have responsibility for areas such as education, health, social services and public safety, and justice.

The Agreement led to power sharing; this encourages politicians to discuss their differences and to reach agreement on issues such as justice. It also created the Equality Commission and the Northern Ireland Human Rights Commission. These organisations safeguard human rights and protect people from sectarianism and racism.

Young people can play a vital role in helping to shape Northern Ireland's future by taking an interest in local politics and by voting. This is important as politicians make decisions which can affect young people, for example, on education and university fees.
