THE DUCHESS STEPS IN TO HELP HEAL ROYAL RIFT

Kate told Harry to make peace ...then they all met up for tea

EXCLUSIVE BY RUSSELL MYERS

The Princesses are barely speaking during a crucial time in the history of the monarchy. A "fourth rift" which both parties have refused to put to bed, has led William and Kate to try to repair a complete and utter breakdown of communication. Between the brothers. The above led to Harry and Meghan moving them to lunch on Easter Sunday. All attended church on Easter Sunday. They had tea and chatted for around 30 minutes at Progress Cottage.

Kate forged a "very strong friendship" with Harry after she and Willa visited closely with him to launch the Royal Foundation and the mental health charity Heads Together. They were neighbours at Kensington Palace before Harry married Meghan, with William once joking that he would often come over to raid food from the fridge.

Apocalypse occurred. The Duchess and Harry have developed a very tense bond over the years. Kate is acutely aware of the importance of William and Harry getting along, not just because of her opinion, but their collective responsibility to the monarchy as a whole.

Harry has acted as counsel to his brother the royalist William and Kate's more traditional year, and she has tried to help her son to become the most transparent partner she has ever known. Kate has tried to help her son to become the most transparent partner she has ever known. Kate has tried to help her son to become the most transparent partner she has ever known. Kate told Harry to make peace ...then they all met up for tea. She is behind 'olive branch' Windsor meeting.

After the years of negativity from the generation before them, behaviour that fuelled constant headlines and bad press, there was hope that the brothers would continue to be each other's ally and support.

But this seemed to have completely broken down. Kate can be very kindly at times and sometimes William is left feeling that he is facing much by consistent responsibility alone. This was a great support, but what they have experienced is what has broken their bond.

At the very core of what has broken their bond is a deep and specific conflict that has not been fully explored. But Harry has spoken in the past about making something of his life himself. He said: "I feel there's just a small window where people are interested in me before [William's children] take over".

In contrast, at the Anne Day commemorations at Westminster Abbey yesterday, Harry and Kate shared and smiled, looking completely comfortable together.
