- The total number of marks for this paper is 60.
- You will be awarded marks in questions 5 and 9 for the quality of written communication of your answer.
- This document consists of 12 pages. Any blank pages are indicated.

Section A – Research methods and evidence

Answer all questions.

Source A: Representations of males and females in fashion magazines

'I carried out a content analysis on two different fashion magazines to see how males and females are represented. I had ten different categories to analyse, including things like occupation, clothing, weight and leisure. I recorded my results into a pre-prepared grid that I'd made, using a tally system. I spent about an hour on each content analysis and worked on my own. I used the January editions of the two magazines for my research.'

This is a summary of the main findings:

- More females than males featured in fashion magazines;
- Females tended to be younger than males;
- More males were shown in an occupational role than females;
- Both males and females were frequently shown in their underwear;
- Most females were clothes size 8–10.

Source B: Gender Identities

The information below is taken from a sociological study that used unstructured interviews to find out about young people's gender identities today. The researcher was an Asian female sociologist who worked undercover for 3 months as a teaching assistant in a London school. She chatted to the young people in her classes and at break and lunchtime. To maintain her secret identity she did not make notes whilst at school but instead wrote a diary of her interview findings each day when she got home.

'I found that girls felt much more pressure to look good, dress fashionably and do well in education. Males were more concerned with looking 'cool' in front of their mates, boasting about their sexual behaviour and 'having a laugh'. It became clear, though, that males were also feeling pressure not to be overweight and to use beauty products to improve their appearance. They also worried a lot about future unemployment and student debt. My research made it clear that male and female gender identities are still not the same'.
