Question Number	Answer	Mark
17 (e)	Duties/tariffs may be imposed on the exported buses to new countries. Therefore, making the goods more expensive, so their profit margin may not be as great. If there are quotas involved there may restrictions on the number of buses that are exported, so that they may not be able to fulfil demand.
	 In addition, E19 may have to overcome the difficulties involved in fluctuating currency rates of these new countries. This could mean E19 selling buses at a loss.
	There may be extra transport costs of exporting the buses to countries that may be further away from E19's base.
	Buses may have different specifications concerning design in these new countries. This may cause additional work for designers and production workers and raise costs.
	E19 may not want to jeopardize its present markets and may decide not to expand its exports at this point in time because it deems difficulties too great to overcome profitably.
