Lighthouses

Storms have driven many thousands of sailing ships onto hidden rocks and, as a result, many sailors and passengers have lost their lives. In the past, families used to light fires or used lamps to help their loved ones reach shore. Later, great fires on primitive buildings helped guide sailors into safe harbours.

The first known lighthouse was built about 280 BC. It stood on the island of Pharos in the harbour at Alexandria in Egypt, one of the richest cities in the world at that time. Indeed, the Pharos lighthouse was so spectacular that it became one of the Seven Wonders of the ancient world. It was over 100 metres high and ships at sea could see the light from its tower from over 50 km away. The Pharos lighthouse survived many earthquakes and other natural disasters for over 1500 years. However, a devastating earthquake in the fourteenth century finally destroyed the lighthouse.

Until the late eighteenth century, burning wood, coal or large candles were used to produce the lighthouses' warning lights. However, in 1782 Ami Argand, a Swiss man (ironically from a country with no coastline at all), invented a new device that burnt oil and produced a clear bright flame. Mirrors were put behind the light to increase the strength of the beam.

A further improvement in 1822 was a lens which, when placed in front of the light, sent out an extraordinarily powerful beam. This lens could rotate to give a revolving beam that looked to a distant observer like a flashing light. Different speeds of rotation and different colour patterns meant that each lighthouse gave off a different series of flashes. With this system sailors could tell one lighthouse from another to identify their exact position at sea.

Britain's most famous lighthouse is the Eddystone, built in 1698. This lighthouse stands on a rock 13 miles away from Plymouth. Keepers of lighthouses like the Eddystone found life lonely and very difficult in the past. Keepers tended to work all on their own for a period of two months before having time off ashore. They required patience as well as bravery to stand the harsh conditions of their work.

Today, lighthouses are all automatic and powered by electricity. Modern technology means inspectors can run the lighthouses from shore and maintenance crews visit remote lighthouses by helicopter only when they need to do repairs.

Comics

It was something we looked forward to each week. Every Friday we would hurry to the newsagent round the corner and for 15 cents each, my mother would buy The Beano for me and The Dandy for my sister. We probably did not yet know how to read the speech bubbles – and I secretly suspect that our parents bought them more for themselves than for us – but we loved them too and shared their enthusiasm. At bedtime mum would read out the stories, acting out the plots with different voices, squeals and squeaks.

Whenever we went to my granny's we'd rush up to the washroom straight to the 'junk trunk' which was a box full of odds and ends that had belonged to my mother and aunt when they 10 were young. Our favourite treasure was the June and School Friend comics' collection, with comic strip stories about Zanna, The Silent 3, and so many others.

With their simple stories of good versus evil, comic book characters such as Superman, Batman and Spiderman are now popular as film characters. However, few youngsters nowadays realise that these heroes first appeared in comics.

Collecting comics is nowadays big business. Hundreds of old comics change hands every day at car boot fairs and jumble sales, and collectors buy and sell many thousands more at auctions and through internet sites.

True collectors of comics do not just buy them to make a profit. They admire the look and feel of the drawings. They love the stories – the tales of adventure, the search for lost treasure... 20 Many famous authors wrote for comic books. Arthur Conan Doyle, Jules Verne, and Talbot

Baines Read, for example, all wrote their first stories for comics.

Student Bounty.com You can read a modern comic from cover to cover in ten minutes, but the old comics provide hours of entertainment. These comics gave a child the chance to curl up in front of the fire or sit in the garden and for an hour or two one could be a pirate in the southern oceans, an 25 explorer in the jungle, or a highwayman like Dick Turpin riding on Black Bess into the sunset.

The first comics were for boys and started to appear and grew in popularity between 1830 and 1840, as the number of people who could read started to grow in Britain. Moreover, as paper became cheaper and printing technology improved, newspaper vendors sold the comics for just a penny each.

At first, very few of the stories were original. Most were simply versions of the stories that were popular at the time. However, the quality of the comics improved and by the early 1900s new comics, like The Rainbow for younger readers, entered the market. These told their stories in 'comic strip' format with a lot of colour. As competition in the market increased, comics started to give away free gifts with their first issues. Today, these are very rare and are also collectors' items.

Although comics were still popular in the 1960s and 1970s, teenage readers began to move towards glossy magazines. Radio and TV eventually killed off the comic as a popular form of entertainment.

40 Comics are no longer popular but the passion for collecting them will last forever. So, if you find any old comics hidden away, do not throw them out for recycling. Check the covers for the date when they were published. If you are looking at anything published before 1960 carefully store the comics away. One day they may be worth a fortune. And even if not, you will certainly enjoy the wonderful stories that you will be able to read there.
