Bob was standing on top of the wooden steps leading to the kitchen. He was clutching a baseball bat in one hand and a broom in the other. He had a frightened look on his face. I could hear Ivan yelping and muttering to himself in the living-room. Bob gave me a look of despair.

"Your python's escaped!" he exclaimed.

"Escaped? But how could it?" I asked.

"I don't know how, but it has. It's slithered into the kitchen. It seems to like there."

I climbed up the steps and looked through the kitchen door. The snake was coiled up near the stove and an overturned pot on the kitchen floor indicated that Ivan had left in a hurry. Ivan poked his head through the living-room door and asked nervously, "How are you going to catch it?"

"We'll have to go in and pin it down," I said, in what I hoped was a steady voice.

"Count me out, I'm not going in there," Bob blurted.

As I could not get either Ivan or Bob into the kitchen with me, I was forced to go in alone. I armed myself with a long, forked stick and a sack and approached the snake with the sack held out in front of me, like a bullfighter approaching a bull. I jabbed at it hoping it would coil up the stick. However, the snake flung off the stick angrily. It hissed and slid swiftly towards the back door, disappearing into the darkness, much to everyone's relief.

Read the passage carefully and answer the questions 51 to 55.

Carrie accompanied her mother to the market. It was crowded with people. There were men, women, old ladies and infants in strollers. The noise was deafening and a mixture of languages and dialects could be heard.

Carrie followed her mother to the butcher. She did not understand what they were saying but she saw the pleased look on her mother's face when she managed to bargain for a lower price for the meat. Next, they bought some vegetables. Carrie's mother spoke in another dialect to the greengrocer. She was amazed that her mother was able to speak more than one dialect. Carrie was even more surprised when her mother spoke in fluent Malay to a lady who was selling some spices.

It was an eye-opening experience for Carrie as she walked around the market. Old ladies displayed an amazing amount of strength as they pushed their grandchildren in their strollers, while holding three to four bags of food in their arms.

Finally, after buying some fruits, Carrie and her mother left the market. Carrie enjoyed helping her mother select the freshest fruit. However, she did not want to go to the wet market again as it was too hot and she did not like the smell of the raw food.
