Section F: Comprehension MCQ (5 x 1 mark)

Read the passage below and answer questions 26 to 30.

Belonging to the weasel family, the mongoose has very short legs, a long body and a short tail shaped something like the English ferret. However it is found only in India where it is very useful for killing the most venomous snakes. A fable is told of the help that a certain mongoose once gave to a crane.

The crane was in its nest with its eggs when it saw to its great terror, a snake hiding in a hole nearby. It was a well-known fact then that the snake would always crawl up to the nest of the cranes and devour the young cranes as soon as they were hatched. The young mother crane, who was utterly helpless, thought of a brilliant plan by which it could get the help of the mongoose. It knew that the mongoose was fond of fish, but would never step into the waters to catch one because of its fear of water. It would rather go without the fish than to get itself wet.

The crane then carried out its plan. With its long neck it soon picked some fish out of a stream nearby. It knew that the fresh fish would make a delicious meal for the mongoose. The clever crane then tore up the fish into little pieces and placed them in a long line all the way from the hole of the mongoose to that of the snake.

The aroma of the fresh fish soon woke up the mongoose which was sleeping soundly in its hole. Without a second thought, the mongoose followed the smell of the fish and ate up the pieces of fish lined all the way from its hole to that of the snake. When it finally reached the hole of the snake, the mongoose entered it. What a surprise awaited him. There in the hole were the snake and its young ones. Immediately the mongoose pounced upon the snake and its young ones and ate them heartily. That day, it had its most satisfying meal but little did it know that it had done a kind deed for the crane.

26. The story tell us how the _____

- (1) weasel helped the snake
- (2) crane got rid of the snake
- (3) snake got tricked by the mongoose
- (4) crane helped the mongoose to catch fish

27. According to the story, the mongoose is a useful animal because _____

- (1) it is found only in India,
- (2) it always helps the cranes
- (3) it can kill the most venomous snakes
- (4) it killed the snake that tried to eat the crane's young.

29

28. The fact that the crane was 'utterly helpless' shows us that it _____
- (1) knew what to do
 - (2) had given up hope
 - (3) was unable to fight the snake by itself
 - (4) would let the snake eat her young ones
29. How did the crane lure the mongoose out of its hole?
- (1) It had a brilliant idea.
 - (2) It used her eggs as bait.
 - (3) It used the snake to lure it out of its hole.
 - (4) It made use of the fact that the mongoose loved fish.
30. What was the 'kind-deed' that the mongoose had done for the crane? _____
- (1) Taking care of its young.
 - (2) Catching fish for the crane.
 - (3) Getting rid of the crane's predator.
 - (4) Helping to kill all the snakes in India.

34

Section K : Comprehension OE (10 x 2 marks)

Read the passage below and answer questions 71 to 80.

When I was young, we lived in a dilapidated wooden house on the outskirts of Limbang, a small town in northern Sarawak, Malaysia. It stood on wooden stilts and had a steep sloping roof of corrugated zinc sheets, which made the house very hot during the day. The tiny collection of rooms inside could barely contain all our family – Father, Mother and 11 children.

We seemed to live in perpetual darkness. During the day, the nearby trees blocked out much of the sunlight. Furthermore, the nights were always brooding, foreboding time. This was the 1950s and early 1960s, and we had no electricity. We lit kerosene lamps, which gave only dim light. The gloom was made worse by the superstitious fears Mother passed on to us. Raised on a mixture of Chinese ancestor worship and Taoist and Buddhist beliefs, we believed in ghosts and malevolent wandering spirits. Our friends, probably afraid of the dark, creepy appearance of the house rarely came over to play. I once overheard one of my relatives telling her children that our house was haunted. We preferred to play rounders and tag in a big field in the centre of town. At dusk, I would reluctantly return home with a feeling of dread.

By the time I was a teenager, my superstitious fears had been replaced by feelings of discontent and shame. All my friends had nicer homes with proper plumbing. We didn't even have a toilet. Instead, we used chamber-pots. If friends dropped by unexpectedly before the chamber-pots had been emptied, I would be overcome with shame. Sometimes the pots were placed in the laundry area in full view. Even if they were still hidden away in the bedroom, I was sure my friends could smell them.

20

When I was 13, I sprained my ankle at school and my principal, a Canadian named Mr Spark, drove me home. We arrived just in time to see my younger sister, Siok Kiat, empty a chamber-pot. Everything was in full view – sister, chamber-pot and cascading urine mixed with excrement. I wished I could have been anywhere else at that moment. I saw Mr Spark as culturally superior, and although he did not say anything, I imagined him thinking "What an unhygienic and unrefined family!"

25

I admit that life wasn't always terrible. We had fun playing hide-and-seek and games of our own invention around the house. And when I was in my mid-teens, we got electricity. A fluorescent tube lit the living room and the bedrooms and kitchen each had a light bulb.

30

Still, I could see nothing much to appreciate about my home. To me, it was ugly, rotten – an eyesore.

35

Then, when I was 16, some teachers from my school came to visit. As my art teacher, Mr Ong entered, he said, “Siok Hong, your house is situated in such a beautiful setting. I had to stop and admire it from the road. All those trees forming the backdrop make it look so picturesque.”

Suddenly, I saw my house in a different light – from Mr Ong’s artistic point of view. The veil that had prevented me from noticing the beauty that had been there all the time fell away.
