Read the passage below and answer questions 26 to 30.

"Have you all got the gist?" our business teacher, Mr Lesser, asked. "Are there any questions?"

Of course, Jumbo Fowler hadn't got the gist. "Can you go over it one more time?" he asked.

"Right," said Mr Lesser. "You, that is this business studies class, are divided into six groups of three. We, that is the school, will lend to each group the sum of twenty dollars. It is then the job of each group to use that capital to earn as much as you can over the period of one semester. At the end of the semester, you return the capital and your earnings to the school. It is a practical exercise in business. If you are going to be the business successes of the future it's about time you had some experience of how business works."

"Don't we get to keep the profit we make?" asked Alison.

"Certainly not," Mr Lesser replied. "The only way I could get the Principal and the School Council to agree to the use of the school's money was to persuade them that you were all such bright business people that you would produce a nice little profit to swell the school fund."

"What if we lose the twenty dollars?" Simon asked. "Some businesses do go broke."

"The school will carry the loss, but your marks will look pretty sick. This exercise carries twenty-five percentage points."

Even Jumbo understood that. After explaining to us that this was his special pet project and that he expected us to excel, Mr Lesser divided us into six groups and gave each group a twenty dollar note.

The other two in my group were Alison and Tim Potter, our class' whiz-kid at Mathematics. "Let's meet after school," Tim said to us. "Come round to my place."

Deep in the Hoang Lien Mountains of north-western Vietnam, a day's walk from the nearest road, ~~the~~^{lay} the H'mong village of Na Hang – fourteen barn-like houses of medieval simplicity almost lost among the trees. The forests sweeping up to the mountains beyond are home to the critically endangered western black-crested gibbon, one of the flagship species we are encouraging the H'mong villagers to stop hunting and help protect. 5

It was 5.30 a.m., almost time for the gibbons to start calling. The H'mong were also early risers, but this particular morning seemed even busier than usual. There was a party atmosphere. The place was full of hornets, in every stage of development – from shapeless grubs to fully-formed adults. 10

The previous afternoon, the eldest son of the household had discovered a hornets' nest, which the villagers had unearthed during the night. All ten storeys, each the span of a cartwheel, were stacked around the house and the floor was littered with hexagonal debris. A group of villagers sat around the fire, plucking grubs from their cells and tossing them into a pot. These grubs – which resembled Brazil nuts when toasted – became breakfast. 15

Beside the door, a bulging sack of smoke-dazed adults gave off a rattling sound. This was the valuable part of the haul. While the grubs were a breakfast treat, the adults meant money. As with most wildlife in Vietnam, hornets are prized medicinally when steeped in local rice wine, known as "ruou". To accompany the roasted grubs, our hosts produced a bottle, clouded by use, in which a number of suspended hornets revolved dreamily. Ruou is to the H'mong what vodka is to the Russians, and no opportunity is lost in finding reasons to drink it. Given that our two-week training programme had been a success, there was good reason for celebration. Signus and I were not getting off lightly – each meal was accompanied by endless rounds of the stuff, and a polite refusal was not an option. 20 25

After dinner, two of our trainees, Lu and Sua, invited us to sample some "special" ruou at their dwelling. The brew appeared served in chipped porcelain cups, fashioned in miniature as if for a doll's house. This brew was apparently of an ancient vintage. It had a warm, reddish colour and tasted different. Sua, meanwhile, delivered a eulogy on its curative properties, claiming that it had thirty ingredients - thirty different animals to be exact.

Before we could ask any further, Lu interrupted, "I promise it doesn't contain any gibbon."

Adapted from BBC Wildlife, April 2005.
