Nicolas Sarkozy: how a once popular president became a toxic brand

France's election hangs on the record-breaking unpopularity of a politician who once set out to transform the country.

Near the rusting, abandoned steelworks perched on a hill overlooking the forlorn north-eastern town of Gandrange, trade unionists put up a gravestone inscribed: "Here lie the broken promises of Nicolas Sarkozy." The French president, fresh from his whirlwind marriage to Carla Bruni in 2008, had vowed that the state would save the factory and he would come back to help. Neither happened. Last month even the gravestone was stolen.

Sarkozy was the most overwhelmingly popular president since Charles de Gaulle. Five years later, 70% of French people think his record is negative. Unemployment is at a 12-year-high, with almost one million more people unemployed than when Sarkozy took office. If François Mitterrand abolished the death penalty and Jacques Chirac kept France out of the war in Iraq, pundits are struggling to define what Sarkozy's legacy might be.

He promised to boost the average citizen's spending power, but up to 15 million French people now struggle to make ends meet at the end of the month. Far from being given a state of grace because of the financial crisis, Sarkozy is personally blamed by France's audit body for a fifth of the rise in the public deficit. Schools are underperforming, social inequality is pervasive and racial divisions run deep. France is the world's most pessimistic nation about its economic prospects.

Sarkozy promised to lower taxes and ended up raising them. He defended the free market over the French social model, then turned resolutely statist, saying the French model had saved France from the crisis in capitalism. But he is still accused of weakening the welfare safety net. A majority of people feel he never intended to keep his election promises to reform France.

Even in his own right-wing camp, Sarkozy's re-election battle in April and May is seen as extremely difficult. The socialist favourite François Hollande has lengthened his lead, and Marine Le Pen, of the far-right Front National, is snapping at Sarkozy's heels. Privately, the president tells supporters "the favourite never wins". He is to launch his campaign next week with a strong right-wing slant on "values", proposing referendums on how to deal with illegal immigrants and the long-term unemployed. But he is avoiding discussing his record in power. The thorny issue of what became of his reform ambitions is left to his ruling UMP party, which has distributed 6m leaflets detailing Sarkozy's "top 10 reforms".
